

HEY BOY MO

A LOCAL ZINE FOR GIRLS AND BOYS!

HomoBoy #1

edited by

Grevzis Jefferson

+

Eric Deutsch

graphics next pg.

by

Luke Sissy Fag
Seattle

Original Story

by

Michael Crawford

HomoBoy is an attempt to end the boredom
and this and that of the Houston queer scene
this is our 1st issue
If u would like to contribute
call 713
561 0762

zine

of people, arts,

and culture

for lesbians

and gay men.

END THE POLICIES OF GENOCIDE BEFORE IT'S TOO LATE

ACT UP

ACT UP

today i stood in protest and chanted in front of a pharmaceutical building in Washington DC. we chanted AIDS CURE NOW! in anger because these people are making money from inflated drug prices for drugs that treat infected people. now that i have the virus i have a new perspective of the frustration many in the ranks must have always felt. now tears come for the first time. i feel compassion for those of us here in battle and for the many here in spirit; too weak to continue the fight or killed long ago. i joined this battle a few years ago for the loved ones i lost, in anger.

now it is my personal battle. healthcare killers have to go! we march and chant :

ACT UP FIGHT BACK! chanting PEOPLE WITH AIDS UNDER ATTACK, WHAT DO WE DO? ACT
UP FIGHT BACK and we repeat...ACT UP FIGHT BACK! and for how long will this battle go on? 13 years more? every 90 seconds the list grows.

today in Washington DC i stand next to my best friend, Michael Crawford, a vigilante crusader for this cause;
strong, courageous, intelligent, and determined. i watch fellow ACT UP members draw chalk outlines of each others bodies on the sidewalk in front of this building. one of the boys quickly inscribes the names of 3 people who have died in the war within the chalk bordered body. i cried today because i wonder how long it will be before Michael will be chalking my name in these ghostly sidewalk tombstones to remind the healthcare assassins that once i had hope in my lifetime there would be a cure but, "THE TIME THEY KILLED KILLED ME!"

CURE

NOW

A

I

D

S

Original Untitled Story

It's morning and I must bite the sleeping man. I'm about to discover the way he wakes up with a new locket for the first time, the way he wakes up with me nibbles on his back. Soon I will know his back, its bumps and freckles and shadows better than he does. I see a scar just above his right kidney. Pink and raised, it carries the history of a permanent injury I knew nothing about. I see the line where his jaw blocked the sun on some journey and some dark moles like the ones they warn about in pamphlets about cancer. Just above his rib there's a strong and tender bald patch of skin, immune to his blanket of transparent hairs. There his waistline sinks; he has colorless bumps, an allergy, an organic reaction to some anonymous substance. Three of his freckles form a triangle and if I had a pen I'd connect the dots like a target on that precious spot of skin, just beneath his left shoulder blade. But because this vulnerable place quivers with my slightest touch I refrain from sinking my teeth into the delicate moment. Frenzied.

But suppose when I bite, he remains private, inaccessible, oblivious through deep sleep, immersed in a dream about walking unscathed down two of the Southwest Freeways among stampeding giraffes. Into his blissful slumber through the tall and quieted, he sinks deeper, sighs, lets out a moan, taking my precious chew for a pebble kicked up by a vegetation quadruped.

Or suppose when I bite, he keeps his lids jammed shut and tries to remember if there's a street cleaning Monday where he parked his car. Suppose he's the silent but frantic, struggling to remember the identity of the man grazing on his back. Stricken with spontaneous amnesia, he peers through the possibilities: the Hispanic startecos from the party last week; his first crush, naked and dripping with sweat moving from the lockers to the shower; or the nameless, flirting boy at the demo last Saturday. Or me, this new and insatiable lover who tracked him for weeks, dragged him out for endless cups of coffee, set smack in his lap, and now contemplates the taste of insect-reso early in the morning.

Suppose when I bite, his eyelids flutter. He thinks he has dreamed, forgets where he is, doesn't recognize the redwood barbecue next to the bed. He snorts, fidgets, ignores my quavering tenderness, settles into silent irritation. After a while, he mumbles something mean, because my indulgent march has startled him into waking. He panics, wonders what strange promise lingers in my head, fears that a precious part of himself will die, that it's the wrong time for love, and that severing is inevitable, an amputation, every time he retreats, imagining me wanting to watch butterflies and buy him little presents, snuggle up for sympathy when I get the flu and say those words that make him want to crawl into a closet.

Or suppose this morning I'm considerate, my new lover: sharp and I don't bite or brood or think about loves from the past. I'm soothed by the gentle rhythm of his breathing, content to snuggle here behind him, my arm hooked around his long, narrow waist. Suppose I get out of bed, spread him the hated "alarm," then wake him gently with the smell of morning brew. He's groggily and boyish, hair sticking out all over. He pants at the sad fate of getting out of bed. In the kitchen we snouch and sip, pull our chairs together, knees bumping.

But we will not have such a morning. I am not a noble, considerate lover. I am not soothed, enchanted and content upon waking up next to this barrage of possibilities. I'm a knotted mess, and the man sleeps while I suffer alone with the terror of biting off an ingredient.

The alarm is about scream. The bite has become a primal need, surpassing food, water, sleep and pride. It's monumental, essential to survival, the orthologous crisis. Bite the man, I tell myself, take the chance. I run a practice chew on my tongue, pull back my lips in preparation for a tiny, sumptuous pinch of his freckled skin. He inhales. His ribs cage expands and that quivery place on his back moves a little closer. It will be easy and sweet, that small grasp of his flesh between just four of my teeth.

But when I open my mouth, he feels my warm breath on his back. Unable to wait any longer he rolls over, gazes at me. Enraptured his eyes open wider. I am even more beautiful than I remembered. I knew it, he says, pulling me closer, you were about to bite.

Now I panic. What strange promise to lurk in his head? A precious part of me will die if I do not consider. It's a hard decision is inevitable, an expectation everywhere; he'll want to snub, butterflies and buy me little presents, snuggle up for sympathy when he gets the flu; Fall day those words that make me want to crawl into a closet. It's the one possibility I haven't considered. With bold enchantment and absolute terror, I sink my teeth right in.

Rent Boy?

... your ad
could go here

QUEERS BASH BACK

A QUEER NATION WARNING

STOP THE VIOLENCE

STOP TH' HATE

A QUEER NA

STOP THE VIOLENCE

STOP THE HATE

A QUEER NATION WARNING

QUEERS BASH BACK

A QUEER NATION WARNING

photos reprinted
w/out permission

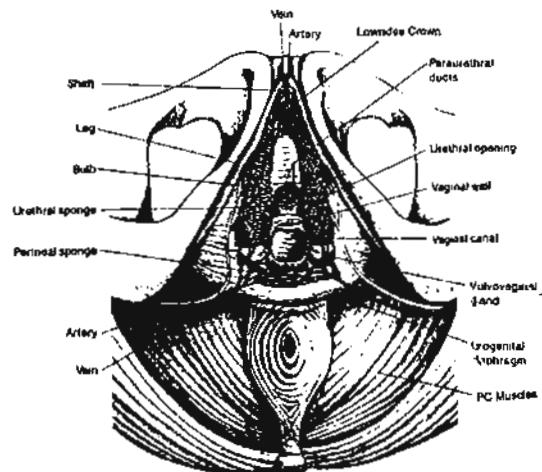

Photos: JONES
styling:
clothing:

does anyone really queer and not a fashion victim i only shop dream victim hurray place behind it.
anyway why didnt the tired and bland houston scene magazine give credit to our own hom boy
antonio f. now in london, figures. this outfit is more easily assembled by thrifting at value village, that's 19th in the heights and harrisburg not downtown.
other models not featured 1.a. looks better bought second hand as well. of course if your lazy or clueless just go to step back on montrose.
it all ends up there.
someway or another.
but most importantly work your look. get
of the jr.s, get thing and stop
"utopian soc"

DYKE'S

DO
IT
TOO

The Erectile Tissue of the Clitoris

No More Nice Girls